Abstinence from drugs and alcohol is often associated with poor emotional and social functioning. In general, drug-related cognitive deficits, depression and psychomotor retardation are thought to be mediated via dopaminergic mechanisms. The dopamine D4 receptor gene has been shown to contain the most polymorphic region of all the human genes known at present. A variable number of 44 bp tandem repeats are present within the third exon of the DRD4 gene. These 44 bp alleles are shown to be inherited as haplotypes at the DRD4 locus and these haplotypes may be associated with enhanced production of dopamine D4 receptors in the brain. The use of a single nucleotide polymorphism (SNP) technique, using the Taqman system to analyze the population genetics at this locus, has determined that the A1 haplotype is present at a significantly higher proportion in female alcoholics than in non-dependent controls. This genotype is also a risk factor for alcohol abuse in men. The authors conclude that functional polymorphisms at the DRD4 locus may be associated with emotional, social and cognitive deficits in alcoholism and drug addiction.In the field of signal detection, in particular in the field of audio, speech, or speech processing, audio coding is of major importance to store and transmit information. In this context, the audio information is converted into a coded form and stored or transmitted. A major goal of any coding process is to achieve compact information representation. On
