He's been healthy all season, and it's not like he's playing as the first- or second-line center in Portland. It's hard to understand why the Hurricanes would be concerned about his speed. Cam Ward, Hurricanes Jonathan Kozubek-USA TODAY Sports Ward has been fantastic so far this season. I'm not an expert on goaltending, but he has been making saves that don't seem possible. He has made multiple high-caliber stops, and the numbers are there to show that. In the past, Ward has struggled with consistency in the month of October. However, he has been absolutely stellar in October this season. He has a GAA of 2.28 and a save percentage of .929. Both numbers are better than his previous season marks of 2.67 and 913, respectively. These numbers aren't surprising, though. Ward has been the Hurricanes' most consistent player all season, and he has been playing in the NHL. His numbers this season are comparable to his AHL

season last year and his numbers from his first full season in the league in 2010-2011. Jack Hillen, Hurricanes Even with Ward's great start, Hillen hasn't been a disaster for the Hurricanes. Like Ward, his numbers aren't out of this world, but they are good for an offensive-minded defensemen. He has seven points in nine games, and his best game was against the Philadelphia Flyers. He assisted on a goal from a teammate and had two goals of his own. He was also one of the best defensemen on the ice that night, and it showed. On the year, Hillen has been average for a defenseman at 5-on 2d92ce491b
