Various hyaluronates, obtained from different sources, have been used in regenerative medicine. We here assess the efficacy of a synthetic high-molecular-weight hyaluronic acid (HA) and a low-molecular-weight (LMW) HA obtained by alkaline degradation of HA on cutaneous wound healing. This was an experimental study using the rats, divided into three groups, each group consisting of 10 rats. A semi-circular skin wound was created on the backs of the rats. The HA agents were topically applied to the wounded area at the time of wound creation. The following parameters were assessed: 1) the degree of re-epithelialization on the fourth day; 2) histopathological changes on the seventh day; 3) the tensile strength of the skin on the seventh day. The wounds were evaluated for any adverse reactions at the site of application. All HA agents significantly accelerated re-epithelialization and the degree of
