The logo of Huawei is pictured on the counter of a store selling mobile phones in Beijing, China October 25, 2019. REUTERS/Jason Lee Huawei is the second-largest telecommunications equipment maker after Sweden's Ericsson, with global revenue of around $60 billion, and is involved in high-profile projects in China. It is under pressure as China seeks to exclude it from its high-speed 5G technology roll-out on national security grounds, and the United States seeks to contain Chinese technological advances. Despite its growing importance in the global telecoms industry, Huawei has struggled to make headway in the region, with slowing growth in China forcing it to downsize some of its operations and cut jobs. It is also embroiled in a legal battle with the United States that could see it lose access to U.S. technology and, ultimately, its ability to do business in the country. "If a Chinese company doesn't want to get caught up in the trade war, then it has to be more careful in the selection of key strategic projects," said a Hong Kong-based industry source with direct knowledge of Huawei's financials. "There is no sign of Huawei slowing down or lowering its target of beating the full-year profit goal." The company, which reported its first quarterly profit in three years in May, said it expected revenue for the year to be stable, while profit and margin targets were unchanged. Huawei did not immediately respond to a request for comment on its 2018 outlook.
