booksQ: Why is there no such thing as being "open" for security? What prevents a simple HTTP server from being kept open for a while to allow for a brute-force attack?
Say there is a website I want to hack. I can open it, and keep opening it until it responds.
Why wouldn't there be a time limit on that, and I could then put the server back up a few minutes later if I got lucky and found a blank page, or redirects which I hadn't thought about or a clean request/response cycle? As in, why doesn't Nginx/Apache/Whatever timeout the response and require another request be sent if the last request wasn't successful? As in, why doesn't the OS "time out" these connections or something? A: If I recall correctly you can set connection timeout on http in the Apache config: Order Deny,Allow Deny from all allow 127.0.0.1 ba244e880a
