In the name of this book, I will call  $v$  as the velocity vector field and  $n$  as the vector field representing the normal to the surface. In components: Writing the two equations as dot products and normalizing, we get the continuity equation: And the equation for the normal component of the momentum balance equation: If we assume that  $v$  and  $n$  are constant, these reduce to: The continuity equation The normal component of the momentum balance equation If we assume that  $n$  is constant, the normal component of the momentum balance equation is the only one that gives us information about the flux. Not by me, but I'm talking about the one about how so many writers are now using Instagram as a tool for marketing and publishing. As I began thinking about how I could use this platform for my own business, I wondered whether Instagram was a good fit for me. Would it make sense to join a site like this? I'd been on Twitter for a while now, and I loved it. I read tweets from people I admired and followed many of them. I enjoyed the conversations that sprang up, and I loved the way that the people who read my work interacted with me. I'd been a bit uneasy with using Twitter, since some of the accounts on the site – like @askjodie – had become rather demanding. I decided that I didn't want to rely on anyone else's words about me. I wanted to know what I thought of my writing, and of myself. So Twitter was out. The same went for Facebook, which was not at all my thing. I continued to look for writing-related sites and blogs that I enjoyed, and this is what I found: Writers' Twitter. It's a site that allows you to create a Twitter account as a writer. You can follow any other Twitter account you like.
