Goddard Division of Aeronautics at the National Institute of Standards and Technology (NIST) has been commissioned by NASA to develop, build, and test a solid-fuel rocket capable of carrying a manned spacecraft to the Moon. It is called the Space Launch System, or SLS. NIST is in the process of building a 1,200-ton mock-up of the rocket that will test all of its components, including an engine, a solid fuel tank, and the booster rocket that will take the SLS to space. NIST already has the test site ready, but it needs the company that will build the test rocket to agree to NIST's terms. You can read about NIST's mission and explain NIST's needs in our summary. You can read the details about NIST's technical need and how much the test will cost in our posting here. Last week we gave you a look at what SpaceX does for its business. This week, we'll look at what Boeing does to make money. Boeing is the second-largest contractor in the U.S. economy, with a $112.2 billion in 2014 revenue. But
