Accelerated growth of the prostate in the rat following dietary supplementation with trans retinoic acid. Although retinoic acid (RA) has been implicated as a causal agent in the induction of an androgen-stimulated prostatic cancer in the rat, there is no evidence that it can directly promote cell growth in prostatic tissue. In a previous experiment, the growth of the ventral prostate of the rat was increased following a 3-month administration of RA, although a similar effect was not evident following treatment with the retinoid analogue N-(4-hydroxyphenyl)retinamide. A possible explanation for this discrepancy could be that the experimental RA is much less active than the administered retinoid. Alternatively, the previous administration of RA may have been insufficient to effect a measurable change in the prostate weight. In the present study, rats were administered the potent synthetic retinoid all-trans RA (atRA), continuously for periods of up to 3 months and the effects of this treatment on the growth of the prostatic epithelium and stroma, and on the histological appearance of the prostatic tissue were examined. Rats received either oral gavages with a suspension of atRA or with a vehicle control twice daily. Dietary intakes of atRA were monitored and were found to be dose-dependent (dosages > 400 mg/kg/day significantly increased the weights of the ventral prostate and seminal vesicle). The cell proliferation markers (assessed by immunohistochemical
