since the 1950s New research shows that the are being pushed farther offshore by wind and sea ice while winds are also becoming more open. Ice is retreating from shore, increasing access to new areas.

Researchers from Norwegian University of Science and Technology (NTNU) examined ice thickness and the wind at the Canadian Arctic archipelago since the mid-1950s, using a network of observation stations that have been maintained by Canadian and Norwegian researchers. The study, recently published in the journal Geophysical Research Letters, also shows that winds are becoming more open in the Canadian Arctic. The fundamental result, says Jakob Grottrup, a senior researcher at the

✓ Convert PDF to RTF, DOC, XLS, PPT, TIFF, HTML, TXT, JPG ✓ Select destination and desired format ✓ Preview documents and configure outputMaster3D A lot has been said in recent years about the "Internet of things" - let's call it what it is - the IoT. While the Internet of things remains in the very first stages of deployment, some vendors are already looking to build applications that span the entire range of the Internet of things. This includes ultra-cheap devices, too. Ultra-cheap Bluetooth-enabled transmitters, connected sensors, controls and other such gizmos - basically anything that can communicate over the Internet - are all the rage these days. But what's the deal with these IoT transmitters and what's the basis for their existence? What's the basis for IoT? An IoT application is any application that has something to do with the Internet of things. It could be anything from an application that lets you download the latest weather data straight from the Internet to a sensor connected to your coffee maker. A lot of IoT applications are fairly simple, but a lot can be done to them - the applications can be customized to do anything from helping your snowplow clear a road, to getting the latest temperature data from one of your computers. The Internet of things Bluetooth and Wi-Fi are two of the protocols most commonly used to provide the wireless link between the IoT device and the outside world. Basically, it's a Bluetooth connection. Wi-Fi is the World Wide Web. While Bluetooth is much more about connectivity and messaging, Wi-Fi can do more than that. The advantage of using Wi-Fi is that it doesn't have to work through the devices own internal radio frequency. This provides a longer range than Bluetooth (but not as long as for example ZigBee). Wi-Fi also gives you a lot of other things that Bluetooth can't do. Things like being able to drop access points into every home and every corporate office, the ability to do things like multiuser connectivity over the network and even to get additional networking capabilities. Bluetooth can't really do that. Even though it has a fairly large range, you simply can't drop a bluetooth device 09e8f5149f
