There are only 4 main types of grip kites:

- Fin-type: Exterior fin located inside the trailing edge of the sail. Depending on the design, fins can be used as wing-type edges, as in some cases, or as the whole wing end of the fin-type kite, to control the kite in higher winds.
- Furling-type: A kite with a deployed length of the tail by which the kite can be operated. In this style, the kite is stored entirely by the loss of the sail or the tail. • Fixed-wing: The kite has no stored length and requires the tail (and possibly a small auxiliary tail) for operation. The back of the kite is 'fixed' to the body, and generally the kite is pulled by a single line with a reel at the kite's center. • Foldable: A kite that when folded can be stored in a compact area or as a very small object. Generally the kite is made of a series of tubes that allow the kite to be folded into a very small shape to be carried or stored.
