Field of the Invention The present invention relates to an electric contact device, and, more specifically, to an electric contact device having excellent welding performance even in a case in which a plurality of electric contacts are arranged in a narrow pitch therebetween. 2. Description of the Related Art There are known electric contact devices which comprise a plurality of electric contacts each being divided into a contact portion formed as a thin plate and a connecting portion formed as a thick plate, and each electric contact is housed in a dielectric housing. In a plurality of such electric contact devices, there is arranged a so-called three-point contact system in which three electric contacts disposed in a narrow pitch therebetween are connected to a high-current supply and the connection therebetween is maintained by the three electric contacts. In this connection, each of the electric contacts is formed in a shape of an inverted "L", and, in order to allow a pair of contacting faces thereof to be brought into contact with each other, the electric contact device is provided with a welding portion, which is configured to be thin in a widthwise direction thereof, to perform welding between the respective contacting faces of the electric contacts. However, the welding
