The study of the adaptation of the personality to occupational work in forestry is quite rare, which indicates the need for a research in this field. The aim of the study is to evaluate the professional, individual and social adaptation of the people working in forestry in the region of the town of Biel/Bienne in 1991-2000. Within the scope of the project "Project Landwirtschaft in der Zukunft" n=303 questionnaires were returned. The adaptation of men working in forestry seems to be balanced, however the adaptation of the women working in forestry is rather poor. These results are supported by the fact that people having chosen forestry as their occupation have a relatively low level of education and are relatively old. Therefore, forestry may be seen as a high-risk occupation which may lead to the occurrence of accidents and injuries, as well as diseases. It is also shown that the people working in forestry may adapt themselves to their work quite well and therefore their adaptation seems to be quite balanced. Thus, the population studied may be considered as a favourable target group for health-promoting interventions. An outbreak of dysentery and diarrhoea in an American school in Chile. An outbreak of gastroenteritis among students at a school in Santiago, Chile, was investigated. Among 1013 students who attended one or more days of the period from 18 to 22 December, 1988, 1023 (98%) were interviewed by telephone. The attack rate was 68% for all diarrhoea-like illnesses and 5% for dysentery. Most students had symptoms from 18 to 21 December. An increase in the number of cases was seen during the first days of the outbreak, but in most cases diarrhoea began only after the start of school, and its onset was abrupt in only two cases. The symptoms disappeared after five to seven days. The study yielded no evidence for an epidemic spread of the illness. The route of transmission was probably
