To evaluate the adequacy of nutritional intake in male prisoners during their sentence. Cross-sectional, descriptive, analytical and retrospective study of nutritional intake in the last six months. The prisoners' intake was assessed using the Willett and Stothart method (multicomponent method). Adequacy was defined by the proportions of nutrient intakes to recommended dietary intakes (RDI). 75.5% of prisoners met the recommended energy intake and 59.2% of proteins intake. Half of prisoners presented inadequate intakes of vitamin C (55.8%), calcium (50%), zinc (48.6%), iron (45.5%) and folic acid (38.8%). The intake of vitamins D, E and B-complex was adequate. Only 32% of prisoners met the recommended intake of fibre. The percentage of prisoners meeting or exceeding the recommendations for protein, calcium, zinc, iron, vitamin C and B-complex was higher in medium-high SES prisoners and in those without health problems. A high prevalence of inadequate nutritional intake among prisoners is detected, with important implications for their health.using System; using System.Collections.Generic; using System.Text; using Hudl.FFmpeg.Attributes; namespace Hudl.FFmpeg.Attributes.Video { /// /// Denoising filter /// public class DenoiseFilter : IFilter { public DenoiseFilter(string path, int filterId) : this(path, filterId, 1) { } public DenoiseFilter(string path, int filterId, int value) : base(filterId) { Path = path; Value = value; Type = FilterType.Denoise; } ///
