oligonucleotide-based screening. The T4-based random plasmid library screening method, which has been adopted by the majority of the human gene expression community, is based on random recombination of multiple DNA fragments into a common bacterial vector. The end result is a population of non-related plasmids, the size of which is determined by the number of randomly recombined fragments. The screening of this large population of DNA molecules generally requires relatively large quantities of DNA and expensive reagents. In this study, we tested and compared 3C-based plasmid library screening to oligonucleotide-based screening for feasibility and sensitivity. By combining the two screening methods, an increase in the power of gene discovery was achieved. A 10-fold increase in the number of clones screened was demonstrated using 3C over oligonucleotide-based screening. This technique eliminates the need for oligonucleotides, allowing smaller initial DNA amounts and short screening times. A process that can be readily repeated to identify multiple human genes or human chromosomal sequences is described. This technique may be of particular value to many gene expression community members to identify important genes within a disease or cancer genome.Q: Extension of C^1 function I want to prove that if $f\in C^1$, then $\frac$
