Pomodoro, a time management technique, was developed in the late 1980s by Francesco Cirillo, an Italian-American in the U.S. and is widely adopted in the corporate world. A basic explanation of the time management technique would be that your day is broken down into 5-minute units and you work on a task (single task) for 25 minutes. You have a 5-minute break during which you can walk around, read, or talk to others. Get it now About Author Expert InTech Tech guru who loves to help and analyze complex technology issues, especially in the area of mobile and internet apps. Tested thousands of apps and my speciality is figuring out what makes an app, or website, tick. And when it comes to naming conventions, they can be as silly as they are pointless. Case in point, the Twitter username for the data analyst Anton Ivanov. He goes by @antoniiv, yet we're going to go ahead and assume that it stands for Anton Ivanov. You know, because why not? Anton Ivanov, Anton Ivanov, Anton Ivanov, Anton Ivanov. That sounds like an awesome name. However, on some websites, people choose their names with a little more thought and purpose. Some folks prefer to use their first name as their username, while others may want to go for their full name. This, of course, is up to you, but the only reason we suggest using your full name is because we're going to be using this website to fill your full name into forms. It's a necessary evil, but it's fun, so we're going to make it work. Your First Name Your first name is probably your most important username. If you're searching for a job, then your first name may be what your employer is going to see first. Then again, some of you may like the idea of branding yourself for your job, and you may have an entirely different username that you're sticking to at work. So, if you're using your first name as your username, we recommend using your first name as the username exactly. Then you can always change it to something else if needed. For instance, if you go on a job interview and you meet with the hiring manager, you could easily change your username to what they're going to see, which, in this example, is going to be a very big
