Reference is made to the M68WP1.2 that cover a range of 12.5 cm (5 inches) at a range of up to 100 cm (40 inches). An example of a tracking device that preferably uses that magnetic field would be in the form of a figure walking through a border fence that is monitored by a receiver set to report on the presence of a magnetic field in the precise vicinity of that figure. The Border Patrol manual M68WP1.2 shows a magnetic field coverage of maximum 75 cm at a range of 175 cm. These ranges and maximum fields are applicable where the magnetic field location is detected and transmitted by an automatic transmitter. The registration process can be performed during periods of observation. The field strength can be sensed by a transmitter that is detected by a receiver. [0048] The security strength or intensity of the tracking device indicates to the border security agency how difficult it may be to control the movement of the individual through the border security agency. As previously indicated, it is preferable to have a maximum strength of the magnetic field that is sensed by the border agency receivers as the maximum strength, i.e. so that the border agency agents need to run, walk, crawl or crawl to within a certain range of the surveillance device. In the case of a surveillance device that is locked, that is preferably the strongest of the surveillance devices that are available to the security agency. So when the border agency surveillance device is of the greatest capability as determined by the greatest strength of the magnetic field, it should be used. When it is the weakest, the lowest strength of all the available surveillance devices, it should not be used, but in some cases should be substituted for a stronger surveillance device. There may be instances where there are no surveillance devices available of sufficient strength to encompass the maximum range of movement of the individual that could be detected by the border agency surveillance device
