The present study was aimed at developing the approaches to the prevention of acute respiratory diseases in children in a polluted area of Moscow. The study involved 2,462 patients (9.33 +/- 1.7 years old). The children from the polluted and clean areas were screened by medical examination. The frequency of acute respiratory diseases in children from the polluted area was significantly higher (18.7%) than that in children from the clean areas (5.3%). The screening of the respiratory health status of the children, their parents and their school teachers (the persons in contact with them) was also carried out.Persistence of the effect of changing from mannitol to 5% dextrose in the perioperative fluid management of children undergoing cardiac operations. The purpose of this study was to assess the effect of changing from mannitol to 5% dextrose for perioperative fluid management of children undergoing cardiac operations. One hundred thirty-six children, ranging in age from 2 weeks to 9 years, undergoing cardiac operations were enrolled in this study. The first and second groups, each consisting of 75 children, were allocated to the groups receiving 1.5 mL/kg/h of 5% dextrose or 0.5 mL/kg/h of 10% mannitol, respectively, for 1 to 2 hours during cardiac operations. The third and fourth groups, each consisting of 21 children, were allocated to the groups receiving 1 mL/kg/h of 5% dextrose or 10 mL/kg/h of 5% dextrose, respectively, for 1 hour during cardiac operations. The groups were compared by measuring postoperative maximum temperature, levels of procaltitonin (PCT) and white blood cell (WBC) count, and frequency of respiratory tract infections during the first 3 postoperative days. The overall incidence of respiratory tract
