* Layers: The most basic means of working with Photoshop is the use of layers. Layers hold all of your composition, and altering one or more layers will reveal those that are underneath. To create a new layer, click the New Layer icon (figure 5.8a). New layers are listed on the Layers palette at the bottom of the window. Figure 5.8a You can use the New Layer icon to create new layers. The original layers are used to create complex composites. Because they are stored on separate layers, you can change one layer without affecting another. Figure 5.8b shows the Layers palette open with the last composition page containing two image layers and a selection layer. As you see, layer 1 is the layer on top, layer 0 is the foreground image, layer 2 is the selection (figure 5.8b). The blue box represents the Photoshop viewport; the red box represents the Layers palette. Figure 5.8b You can use layers to assemble an image. Each layer has a specific purpose, and it's important to know what each layer does for you to understand how to manipulate images. For example, the first layer (red) is the active layer. If you change any of the selection properties or position a new layer, it will go on top of the layer with the active selection property. Therefore, it is best to start out working on the active layer (topmost) layer and work down to the bottom layer. As shown in figure 5.8b, the topmost layer is visible (and active) in the Layers palette, with the red box showing the right area for a change. All the other layers are also visible in the Layers palette, as shown in figure 5.8c. The process of selecting a layer in the Layers palette is essential to Photoshop and has a number of advantages. For example, it is very easy to move elements between layers. Select the layer or layers that you want to move, and click the Move tool. You will notice that a layer icon is displayed next to the current layer on the Layers palette. The layer icon is a little checkmark (figure 5.9a), and moving the layer icon to the new location will move the layers to the new location. Another example of using the Layers palette is where you place selections. Selections can be of any size and shape and can be done by using the Rectangular Marquee tool or by Injection of botulinum toxin type A in the first 4 years of life results in functional impairment in the upper extremities: a 5-year follow-up study. The authors investigated long-term outcome of children (n = 185) treated during their first 4 years with subcutaneous injections of botulinum toxin type A (BTX-A) for cerebral palsy. Assessment was by history, clinician examination, semiquantitative, and objective measurements. Children injected bilaterally with type A BTX-A for spasticity improved in musculoskeletal functioning, strength and endurance, manual ability, hand position, gait, and walking ability. Outcome was satisfactory in many children. Functional disability was related to the higher degree of spasticity. BTX-A treatment of the upper extremities is beneficial for the children; most children with satisfactory outcome are found among the spastic children and those treated early during the first years of life. Early treatment of cerebral palsy with BTX-A for spasticity may be important.

Oocyte-specific RNA polymerase II. The zona pellucida protein ZP3 is required for fertilization, and recent studies suggest that its function may involve the synthesis of early embryonic mRNA. Here we have isolated a clone encoding the unique subunit of ZP3 (ZP3A') using a PCR-based strategy. The 804-bp insert contains an open reading frame (ORF) encoding a 69-kDa protein similar to the known components of eukaryotic RNA polymerase II (POL II). ZP3A' was readily identified in somatic tissues and was present in the early embryo, starting at the 8-cell stage and continuing throughout compaction and blastocyst formation. Using RT-PCR, we identified the subunit in the mouse ovary and oocyte. The ZP3A' subunit was isolated using cDNA encoding full-length ZP3. Subsequent to the cloning of the ZP3A' ORF, the cloned cDNA was expressed in a baculovirus and used to raise antibodies against the recombinant protein. The polyclonal antibodies gave a marked immunostaining in the oocyte nucleus, and a positive band was seen in the ZP3A' immunoprecipitated sample.
