Several extremely specific inhibitors have recently been isolated from the nitrogen-fixing organism Azotobacter vinelandii. One such inhibitor, methyl-[methyl-3H]phosphonate, has been shown to inhibit the alkyl monoester phosphatase activity of cells and is proposed to act as a suicide substrate for the enzyme. This study describes the hydrolysis of methyl-[methyl-3H]phosphate and N-(methyl-3H)ethyl-N-(methoxyethyl)amide by the enzyme. The values of the activation and equilibrium constants indicate that the hydrolysis reaction, which follows an ordered Bi-Bi mechanism, is very specific for the phosphotriesters and their hydrolysis reaction is less specific for the phosphomonoesters. The utilization of [methyl-3H]methylphosphate as a suicide substrate was used to measure the Vmax and Km for the enzyme reaction with each of the phosphotriesters. The kinetic data suggest that phosphate monoesterase specificity for C1-substituted substrates is not closely correlated with C1-substituent size or charge and implies that substrate recognition of these enzymes is rather complex.
