CAD applications based on AutoCAD Autodesk launched an AutoCAD application development tool, AutoLISP, in 1992 for Macintosh and Windows. This LISP (a programming language created by John Warnock of Adobe Systems for developing software) allowed users to extend AutoCAD's functionality and create add-ons for AutoCAD. This ability is still retained in AutoCAD 2016 and AutoCAD LT. AutoLISP was replaced by Visual LISP (VLISP) in 1997, but was later replaced by VBA for AutoCAD in 2002, which allowed AutoCAD users to automate their work without having to learn programming languages such as AutoLISP or VLISP. The VBA language uses the Visual Basic editor, as does Visual Basic for Applications (VBA for AutoCAD). VBA for AutoCAD was extended by Autodesk to provide many of the same features found in the Visual Basic application development tool, including use of the Ribbon. Visual Basic for Applications (VBA) can be embedded into the ribbon, if not also the application window, of AutoCAD. AutoCAD has VBA support as part of the OEM version of AutoCAD, which is the core application. Third-party development teams using AutoCAD LT and other applications can use the SDK to create VBA-based plugins for AutoCAD. This is also the case with AutoCAD for Mac, which is bundled with VBA development tools. This ability allows users to customize AutoCAD to an extent not possible using the OEM version of AutoCAD, and requires no programming knowledge. AutoCAD LT, without the OEM version, cannot use the SDK to create plugins or develop other applications.

AutoCAD LT can use VBA macros to customize the application; however, these macros cannot be used to automate repetitive tasks.

AutoCAD Exchange Apps.

AutoCAD Exchange Apps (AEA) is a term used to refer to products that extend AutoCAD functionality. These products have special licenses and must be purchased from a reseller. API AutoCAD's primary interface to the user is through its Application Programming Interfaces (APIs). AutoCAD exposes a number of APIs for customizing the program. All of these APIs are found within the AutoCAD Application Programming Interface (API). The API contains additional functionality,
