Topalt Reply Reminder for Outlook Cracked Accounts is a powerful and handy software package that is designed to help you prevent yourself from… Price: Free Visit: PayPal: September, Google launched a similar project that offered an enhanced search experience specifically for people who use screen readers. Accessible Search lets users hunt for specific terms and then further refine them using the visual portions of search results. Google will continue to refine that interface, said Nick Drohan, Google's accessibility leader. This week, Drohan said the company had narrowed down the list of accessibility features that it's targeting to launch in the future. Today, the company's first update comes in the form of "Knowledge Graph Cards," which will show users various products, movies, and publishers. Knowledge Graph Cards are cards that appear over top of some search results. Until now, you'd have to click on the card to access the product's product page or details about the movie. That's a strange design choice, especially because there's usually a strong case for linking to the card directly, since it's a better experience for the user. The new design is more direct, but it still needs some polishing. For instance, Drohan said, the Knowledge Graph Cards don't always work. And users have different ways of ordering them – some prefer the search results, others want to see Knowledge Graph Cards as a top level in their search results. Beyond that, the biggest challenge for Knowledge Graph Cards is how to build on the new interface, Drohan said. "If you try to break this out of Google, we really have to build a good story for each Knowledge Graph card," he added. Google has a repository of around 300 Knowledge Graph cards that are available to anyone who wants to help create additional cards. Kenny Woodward, executive director of the American Foundation for the Blind, said the change is a "great improvement." He added that Knowledge Graph Cards should link directly to the product, show more than one product, and be able to be pinned to user's home pages, where the brand logos will also be visible. Google is also working on another accessibility-related product, A11Y, the company
