tbd1@softpedia.com The majority of the permits issued for oil and gas drilling in California this year were granted without environmental reviews for projects under the state's new approach to fracking. Since the start of the year, the state Department of Conservation's oil and gas division has issued 55 permits for well sites and five directional drilling plans for new oil and gas wells, a department spokesman said. The permits and plans don't include reviews of how the drilling operations could harm California's water supply, air quality or wildlife. And they don't appear to be helping bridge the state's huge debt. Instead, they represent the part of California's new oil and gas law that sped up the issuance of drilling permits in February. The law went into effect Jan. 1, and since that date the Division of Oil, Gas and Geothermal Resources has issued its first permits. The department will publish those permits online later this week, the spokesman said. One of the first projects to go up was a drilling company's plan to drill horizontal wells in the San
