The review focuses on basic and clinical studies that are available on the phototoxicity of ciprofloxacin. Parenteral and intramuscular injections of ciprofloxacin are associated with a high incidence of phototoxicity, which is most likely due to the presence of its photosensitising agent, eosin Y. Phototoxicity induced by the oral administration of ciprofloxacin has also been reported. Clinical phototoxic reactions may occur after exposure to sunlight and/or radiation. Phototoxic reactions to ciprofloxacin include mainly skin photosensitivity reactions and photoallergic contact dermatitis. Based on the available toxicological evidence, ciprofloxacin is not mutagenic in bacterial and mammalian cells. It was also non-genotoxic in the

Ames and comet assays. Although there are no available data on ciprofloxacin-mediated photoallergic reactions, the preliminary data presented in the literature suggests that ciprofloxacin may induce photoallergic reactions. A phototoxic potential of the active metabolite, ciprofloxacin-5-hydroxyl, was demonstrated in a test conducted on human skin. A number of studies indicate that ciprofloxacin is phototoxic not only via photosensitising reaction but also via the formation of reactive oxygen species. The phototoxic potential of other fluoroquinolone antibiotics including moxifloxacin, levofloxacin and gatifloxacin has also been investigated. Ciprofloxacin is not considered a major 570a42141b
