We describe a case of a 79-year-old woman, without a history of coagulopathy, who developed a hematoma of the chest wall while preparing to leave the hospital. Heaving and a dyspnea could be detected. A chest X-ray revealed pneumatosi of the right hemidiaphragm, and an CT revealed a subcutaneous mass. A diagnosis of subclavian vein dissection and a subclavian hematoma was made. Emergency hemodialysis was initiated and the patient was referred to our department for surgery with a diagnosis of a false aneurysm or a subclavian vascular fistula. A different diagnosis was made by the operation. A standard skin incision was performed and the patient was diagnosed with a false aneurysm arising from the subclavian vein, and a subclavian hematoma. The false aneurysm was repaired, and the subclavian hematoma, which contained coagulated blood, was drained. The amount of drainage was about 10,000 ml, and the patient was able to leave the hospital. The false aneurysm was considered to be the cause of the subclavian hematoma, and the subclavian hematoma was considered to be the result of trauma. A subclavian hematoma is a rare condition. This case illustrates a rare cause of a subclavian hematoma and an unusual cause of a subclavian vascular fistula.The present invention relates to a variable gain amplifier for amplifying a signal with the gain of which variable, either in real time or programmably by a user, can be automatically or manually set. The gain of an amplifier is generally known to be a parameter to be set either in real time (for example, at the beginning of a transmission) or programmably (manually by a user). Variable gain amplifiers may be used in mobile telephony (including, for example, GSM and iDEN type systems) and in the radiofrequency link of a cellular telephone network. A generic variable gain amplifier is shown in FIG.
