The story of the big blobby BB gun has been familiar to most people ever since the introduction of the electric "Shotgun" in 1929. But its initial appearance was not always that familiar to the American public. In fact, the first image of a properly-titled "blobby" gun appeared in trade catalogs in 1898, just five years after the invention of the first electric electric gun. These trade catalogs also inspired the creation of the first blobby gun, based on the design of the earlier electric gun. The new toy, a BB gun with a wooden "blast barrel" that held a string of BBs, was called "The Electric Gun Company's Moulton Model E", and it was issued as a premium. The description was: "Why have a real gun when this toy can shoot into a target, and who cares for the noise?" More than a decade later, in 1907, another electric gun was issued by the American T.O.M. Co. It had a similar design to the first "Moulton" gun, except that the barrel was of a black-finished wood rather than the usual red or white one. The new gun was called the "T.O.M. Co. Model C." It was produced in seven models, from the Model A to the Model G. Each of these models had different stringing capacities, with the higher numbers providing longer strings. In 1914 the guns were advertised as "The T.O.M. Co. Model BB Gun." This was the first time that the abbreviation "BB" was used for BB gun. This also was the first advertising appearance of the name "B.B." to refer to a BB gun. B.B. Gun (brand) The T.O.M. Co. Model BB Gun became a popular toy. In 1916, the Moulton model G was reissued. This gun was the first to combine the new design of the "blowback" action with the barrel being a holder for individual BBs, rather than a single
