In the course of examination and treatment of patients, it is often necessary to reposition the patient in a specific manner to obtain an improved view of a particular body part. Various tables, supports and other devices are available which enable a patient to be repositioned for a particular medical procedure. While most of these devices work well in some situations, there are a number of disadvantages with respect to their use. In particular, most of these devices require that the patient assume a particular position to obtain the required view. When repositioning a patient, there is always the possibility of a patient "bumping" or otherwise losing his or her desired position on the table. Another disadvantage of many of these devices is the requirement that the patient himself or herself reposition the patient. This requires constant attention from the physician, which is undesirable. Because of the foregoing, it is desirable to have a table or repositioner which is easily used, and allows a patient to be positioned in any desired position for examination or treatment.display_field =='select') { $class['input'] ='select'; $class['name'].= '-select';

Unfortunately, it is time consuming and requires a great deal of skill to produce a satisfactory outcome. There are currently three ways to twist a yarn into a continuous strand. The first way is to spin the yarn in a spring-loaded spinning wheel. A second way is to use a wheel set called a bobbinette. A bobbinette is a spinning wheel with the primary mechanism being a bobbin. A third way is to use a spindle. The existing techniques, however, are limited because of their many disadvantages. For example, spinning wheels are difficult to maneuver in areas not easily accessible and are not convenient to use. Bobbinettes and spindles are bulky and difficult to manage in tight spaces and have many mechanical problems with looseness and loss of accuracy. Bobbinettes are also not easy to operate by children because the bobbin system is not natural for human hand movements. This is especially true of a bobbinette with a cassette which holds the yarn. This system has the yarn wrapped around a rotating spindle. Because the cylinder is too large, the user can only work with a limited number of feet of yarn at any given time. A bobbinette with a cassette also has a certain amount of friction with the cylinder which makes it very difficult for the user to maintain control of the yarn. This is because the winding mechanism operates on the theory that the bobbin is in tension and must maintain a constant amount of tension. When the bobbin is tightened, it contracts and puts more tension on the yarn. So, as the yarn is being wound, the bobbin contracts tighter and tighter. The constant tension keeps the bobbin in line and it cannot unwind. Therefore, the yarn is wound off the bobbin from the top. In the event the user does not have sufficient dexterity to unwind, the bobbin must be rewound. Additionally, the bobbinettes are limited in that they can only be used with a single type of
