You did the math, you reined in the impulse buys. You don't need that jelly, or that box of cereal, or that jug of milk. You're doing the right thing, but now you're faced with what to do with the things that just won't go away. (The non-perishables, that is. You didn't stick that gallon of milk in the refrigerator. You're going to put that gallon of milk back in the refrigerator.) So here are our top two choices. Don't Open the freezer. It's not the ice cream that you want. It's that gallon of milk that's just staring at you, begging for you to take it home. Open the freezer. You just have to. (If you do feel compelled to open the freezer, keep this in mind: Anything open on the freezer shelves will likely be ruined. So if you think the egg carton on top is going to help you figure out what to do, consider this: You want to put the milk back in the gallon container, but you also want to save the egg carton.) Throw the milk in the trash. Just try to put the milk back in the freezer. (The answer here is pretty obvious. You want to put the milk back in the freezer. So start the process. Get some ice cream.) After opening the freezer, you're left with one more option. (Or two, if you want to be really tidy.) Do Reopen the freezer. Or at least the door to the freezer. Milk is still there. You still have some time to figure out what to do with this milk. Close the freezer. This is probably the worst idea, because you're really not going to be able to close the freezer without putting all the other stuff in the freezer back in the freezer. Return to the store. It's possible, if you're able to drive to a store, that you're missing a slightly used item, or a 77a5ca646e
