It also allows you to perform various other operations, such as splitting the files, renaming them, adding new music files, and even interleaving the files.Detention zone A detention zone, also referred to as a customs and immigration zone or controlled area, is a demilitarized area inside an immigration or border control checkpoint or at the border zone of the land border of a country. Customs and border protection agencies have the right to conduct surveillance and check identity cards of people arriving from another country; they may arrest those people if they attempt to evade the control. Controlled areas are created on land borders of countries, for example on the borders of Switzerland or Italy. They typically extend from the border, one kilometer in-bound and out-bound from the border. The inner part of the border is referred to as the border zone. In an area extending from the border, checkpoint or border zone to the outer edges of the zone, there are other border control mechanisms than those mentioned above. For example, airport security and border controls usually take place within the airport or border areas. Detention zones are one element of a larger system of border controls including a primary form of border control which can include the use of border control measures such as barriers, fences, high-technology measures, etc. and secondary level of border control which includes the use of identity documents and the use of other types of border control measures such as green lights and crossing controls. History Detention zones were introduced in border areas of Austria and Switzerland between 1919 and 1938. In the 1950s, detention zones in France were tightened. In the 1950s, the International Check Point System was developed to further strengthen border controls on land borders, these included Detention Zones. The Check Point System was firstly introduced in the Netherlands by the Border
