Why we need immuno-oncology The future of cancer treatment is unlikely to be found in increasing the efficacy of chemo, radiotherapy or surgery. Instead, it is likely to rely on the development of new small molecules that turn off genes expressed by cancer cells, and on a new era of immunotherapy - or it could be a combination of the two. Researchers over the past decade have become increasingly interested in harnessing the body's immune system to combat cancers in the same way that antibiotics kill bacteria. Immuno-oncology, if it proves successful, could increase the cure rate for the approximately 5 per cent of cancers that are currently curable without surgery and a considerable proportion of those with less aggressive cancer types. The excitement about immunotherapy stems from the fact that it is an entirely natural response to cancer, as it was when the body fought bacterial infections or when it combats virus. The immune system recognises infected or transformed cells as "foreign" to the body and attempts to destroy them. Cancer cells are no different and in response the body produces a kind of radar that "zaps" these cells. The second important feature of immunotherapy is that the immune response is "re-educated" as a result of treatment. However, the immune system is supposed to work in a way that also preserves normal cells, but what happens if we do over-activate the immune system, or confuse it? There is increasing evidence that this may indeed be occurring, and that chronic inflammation - associated with multiple chronic conditions, from cardiovascular to neurodegenerative - could be responsible for a whole range of cancer types. A recent study by researchers at a centre for regenerative medicine at Cork University Hospital (CUH) and elsewhere in Ireland has found a positive correlation between number of previous cancer diagnoses and the risk of developing bowel cancer. While it's likely that the researchers can't tell us whether cancer causes chronic inflammation, they can certainly tell us that there is a correlation, and they are suggesting this is one possible way that inflammation may cause bowel cancer. What does this mean for you? If the evidence holds true, we need to find ways of dealing with cancer using the techniques of immuno-oncology, rather than chemically trying to cut the cancer's head off. It is important to understand that immunotherapy is not a "magic bullet" - it requires doctors to learn how to finely tune the
