The automaker is proposing to use a diesel engine that would switch in and out of a low-emission mode depending on driving conditions. In less-than-ideal conditions, the mode would reduce diesel emissions. In ideal conditions, the mode would reduce NOx emissions, which is the cause of VW's diesel-emissions scandal. VW has also submitted plans to reduce emissions from the Touareg's engine, called EA189, the Post reports, though a final decision is not expected until next year. Volkswagen's plans to minimize gas emissions from the Touareg were first reported in the German newspaper Handelsblatt. The plan is reminiscent of Toyota's plans to introduce a hybrid SUV, the RAV4, which it announced earlier this year. Unlike the RAV4, which the company claims will offer up to 40 mpg in the U.S., the Touareg has not been announced with a fuel-economy number. Volkswagen's chairman, Martin Winterkorn, resigned last year after an investigation by the German government into his role in the company's cheating. The company is facing fines and lawsuits from U.S. and German authorities who allege that its emissions software altered air pollution tests. Last week, Audi admitted that its German-market SUVs emitted high levels of pollution, according to the Post.Q: Connecting free and paid apps together?
