Databases, such as Online Analytical Processing (OLAP) databases, store information in rows and columns in a multi-dimensional format. Dimensions are attributes, such as time, product type, customer type, geographic region, or any other attribute that is organized in rows and columns. Data is typically organized by month, year, day, and so on. Each record in a database may have a plurality of dimensions. Such databases are used to facilitate analysis of large amounts of data for making real time decisions. Analytical queries are often used to extract information from database records. An analytical query may include, for example, aggregation operations such as counting, summing, mean, minimum, maximum, and so on. Conventional databases provide static analysis capabilities. Thus, the data in such a database is always used to compute results for queries.Richard I. Crane Richard I. Crane (born 1952) is an American professor of religion and history. He is the Louis J. Defines a new syntax element called a MACRO. MACROs let you expand a macro's expansion list within a C expression, and you can use them to conditionally execute other expressions. For example, you can use a MACRO to pass a parameter to a database procedure.

Tables / Structures Syntax Description

Argument An optional argument. Arguments are parameters passed to the MACRO within an expansion list. They are evaluated in order from top to bottom, and the last value defined overrides the previous value.

Argument List Arguments are specified in a comma-separated list. If the first argument of the expansion list is an expression, then the resulting argument list is defined by the contents of the expression. If the first argument of the expansion list is a sequence of MACROs, then the resulting argument list is defined by the first argument and the sequence of MACROs.

Expression An optional expression to evaluate. For example, a sequence of MACROs can be used to define a list of pairs. Then, the expression of a pair can define the value of a single element of the list.

Expression List Expression lists can contain one or more comma-separated expressions. Each expression list defines a single argument.

Name The name of the table.

Table A table is a structure to which arguments can be assigned. Each table is identified by a name and a null (empty) optional sequence of columns. Tables are declared by creating a block and defining a table structure as the block. The following example creates a table named TBL_LIST that contains the following columns:

ITEM DATA NAME Name of the item. Data of the item. NAME of the list. List of item.

Code Sample

(DEFBLOCK TBL_LIST () (ADDITEM TBL_LIST ITEM DATA (NAME ITEM) (DATA DATA) (NAME NAME) (LIST ITEM) ) ) tbl_list TBL_LIST : (DEFTABLE TBL_LIST () (ADDITEM TBL_LIST ITEM DATA (NAME ITEM) (DATA DATA) (
