The present invention relates to a bidirectional data transmission apparatus suitable for a virtual private network (VPN) which multiplexes communication lines and path data transmitted via the communication lines to transfer them in the form of a packet or frame. Conventionally, a VPN, which multiplexes a plurality of communication lines to transfer data in the form of a packet or frame, is provided in a data center, large scale computer center, or private branch exchange which are wired with respective communication lines for each user terminal to set up a logical communication path between users. The VPN realizes a secure data communication path by encrypting the communication path by using a common key, and performing a unitary transmission/reception of communication packet data between a plurality of users by using a cryptographic algorithm, such as public key, symmetric key, and hash function. Heretofore, the VPN network, by using the conventional bi-directional communication and management method, has been performed by locally managing each communication line with a distribution processing unit (DPU) and a gateway unit (GU) for each terminal station. However, when the number of terminal stations is large, the DPU and the GU have to be installed in an excessive number, and the management thereof becomes complicated. Accordingly, an object of the invention is to provide a bidirectional data transmission apparatus capable of easily performing bidirectional
