To determine if increased body temperature (hyperthermia) in horses results from fever or illness, including aseptic encephalitis, and whether blood sample type influences temperature readings. A retrospective study of blood samples submitted for examination to the Department of Pathology and Medical Microbiology of the University of Melbourne between January 2002 and December 2005. Twenty-seven horses with hyperthermia had abdominal, thoracic or carpal samples submitted. Horses were divided into those with fever and those without fever. Also, horses were grouped according to whether blood samples were collected at the time of hyperthermia or if blood samples were collected several weeks after hyperthermia. The samples were divided into two groups, depending on the anticoagulant used for blood collection. The results were compared with a reference interval obtained from a blood sample submitted to the Department for routine pre-race testing. The frequency of fever was high, with 22 of 27 horses (81%) having a febrile response. 5b5f913d15
