Consideration of serum ferritin in the diagnosis of iron overload in pediatric patients with inflammatory bowel disease. Among a population of pediatric patients with inflammatory bowel disease (IBD), high serum ferritin was a common finding. The purpose of this study was to determine whether high ferritin in this patient population was a consequence of greater iron intake or transferrin saturation, or that, more important, it reflected iron overload, since many of these patients suffered from an underlying malabsorption syndrome. Transferrin saturations were well within normal limits for all study patients. Serum ferritin correlated well with the amount of iron received and the percentage of iron absorption as measured by the isotope technique. These data suggest that, at least in this patient population, transferrin saturations fall within normal limits, serum ferritin reflects iron intake and absorption, and that serum ferritin is a valid, inexpensive test for measuring iron overload.#!/usr/bin/python2.7 from shims import import_shim import shim import shims import shim

Dietary supplementation of low-methoxyl (low-Ma) and trans-fatty acid-rich olive oils, mainly composed of oleic acid, normalizes high-density lipoprotein dysfunction induced by copper-induced oxidative damage in male Wistar rats. The aim of this study is to determine the effect of two dietary fats on oxidative stress and high-density lipoprotein (HDL) metabolism in the presence of a copper-induced injury. Male Wistar rats were divided into eight groups: the first one was used as control and fed a standard diet; the second one was fed a standard diet and received a 10% potato oil in their diet; the third one was fed a standard diet and received a 10% high-Ma olive oil in their diet; the fourth one was fed a copper-supplemented diet and received a standard diet; the fifth one was fed a copper-supplemented diet and received a 10% potato oil in their diet; the sixth one was fed a copper-supplemented diet and received a 10% low-Ma olive oil in their diet; the seventh one was fed a copper-supplemented diet and received a 10% trans-fatty acid-rich olive oil in their diet; and the eighth one was fed a copper-supplemented diet and received a 10% high-Ma and 10% trans-fatty acid-rich olive oil in their diet. The data obtained show that after the liver injury was induced, HDL serum levels and apoA-I mRNA liver levels were significantly diminished, while in the presence of a copper supplementation, HDL levels significantly decreased. On the other hand, the administration of a 10% of a diet enriched in either low-Ma or trans-fatty acid-rich olive oils (even when in combination with a copper-supplemented diet) significantly enhanced HDL serum levels. Furthermore, low-Ma and trans-fatty acid-rich olive oils administration partially ameliorated the liver dysfunction induced by the copper supplementation. In conclusion, dietary supplementation of low-Ma and trans-fatty acid-rich olive oils enhanced HDL metabolism, induced by a copper-induced oxidative damage.Q: Javascript - How to Filter array of objects in array of objects I am filtering an array of objects in array of objects.
