A: Can anyone explain what happens? The terms euro or european are not specific to a single country: they include all European states and also some of those not geographically in Europe, e.g. the United States and Canada. I just want to know what happens In the world, European countries are often split up into two or more parts. In the case of England, the country proper is divided into the north of England and the south of England, and Scotland shares border with England. In the case of the US, e.g. you could divide the region and parts into east and west, north and south, etc. Note that the term American is also used for both. However, the term "American" is the name of a country, and therefore can be restricted to the United States and Canada only, except when used to mean the inhabitants of that country as opposed to anyone else: "German auto manufacturers moved to the USA in the aftermath of World War II where they were forced to share their technology. The surviving German companies and their descendants founded a new nation, the USA, to take control of their own destiny. I don't think they needed to be forced" Therefore: There are two versions of this question: What happens when European states split? What happens when the European Union splits? In both cases the answer is that states/parties/countries become independent - but then the name for the country changes. In this case, in the case of a split of the EU states/parties/countries within the EU become independent (as opposed to the (small) states of the UK, where they are members of the UK but have limited powers, so it is not really a state). How to refer to the EU? This is a more complex issue. For instance, it is used as a name for the European community - e.g. "One thing that I have heard people call the European Union is the Common Market, which is referred to often without the "com" or "community" to avoid confusion when used in front of the word market (since they are

Enjoy complimentary light appetizers and soft drinks, enjoy a live band, and get your picture taken with a U official in a U photo booth. This is a great way to reconnect with fellow alumni in the area. Please stop by and say hello!Q: how to create dynamic records using a view in mysql I am using a view in my MySQL database to return data. It is a simple view that returns a list of items from a table. In my view I use the select statement as follows: SELECT DISTINCT module.name, module.date_entered, COUNT(item.name) FROM items, module WHERE items.module_id = module.module_id GROUP BY module.name, module.date_entered This returns me the data I need, however I am trying to figure out how I would be able to generate a dynamic list. If there are X number of items in the table, I would want the view to only return a subset of those items. I thought perhaps something like this might work, but I was unsuccessful: SELECT DISTINCT module.name, module.date_entered, WHERE WHERE item.name IN ( SELECT DISTINCT module.name, module.date_entered
