A: This works fine: library(XML) webElem heading$tagName [1] "div" UPDATE: Of course, they changed it and made it easier. Please see the other answer for how to deal with that. A: If you're going to stick with `html::readHTMLTable`, I would just use a slightly different approach. `importXML` gets the page you want to scrape, and then the next level down you want to parse is nodes. So instead of this: `library(XML)` `library(XML2)` `library(tools)` `webElem` `1cdb36666d`

How should I make a website? A: How should I make a website? It is a question that can not be answered well. Website development is all about trial and error. Im in Php, but I don't know much about xhtml. Should I do it in Php? You need to know xhtml a lot to build a basic website because HTML is not about programming. How can I keep my website on the web without a domain name, or a web hosting company?

You can register the website name on a domain manager company. But that domain will cost you. Instead of paying for the domain, you could register a domain on a free web hosting. To build a website, you need a free web hosting and a server. To develop a website, you need programming software. A: How do I get a website online? First, you need to figure out what your goal is. You say: I am in PHP but don't know much about xhtml. Should I do it in PHP? So, if you want to build a website to host a game, that is a lot of incorrect information. You could: use php/html to code the site, with minimal knowledge of xhtml. code in python, that will require no knowledge of xhtml. code in javascript, with no knowledge of xhtml. Let's look at your examples. Im in Php, but I don't know much about xhtml. Should I do it in Php? You need to know something about XHTML to write a web page that works well on most browsers. HTML is a simple scripting language, with virtually no learning curve. You don't need a lot of XHTML knowledge, to write a website that works well. I would recommend to spend some time learning javascript, which is a text-based scripting language. In theory, you could use a combination of PHP/HTML and Javascript to build a moderately complex website. But that would be incredibly complex, and probably require extensive programming knowledge. How can I keep my website on the web without a domain name, or a web hosting company? You can register a domain name on a domain manager company. You will pay a year at a time, in exchange for a nice domain name, with the domain managed for you. Usually, web hosting
