Regardless of the fact that Flash works fairly well on a few mobile devices, it is thought of by many as an act of obvious evil by many. On Wednesday, members of the Android community and developers around the globe went on to celebrate a victory in what some will consider a very unconventional way. The adobe

Ltd.. 3.2(5), 3.3(3), 3.4(1), 4.1(15),Q: How do I stop log4net from writing to console? I'm using log4net in my MVC 3 application, and it writes to the console. How do I prevent it from doing so? I'm pretty sure it's something quite simple that I'm overlooking, but I just can't figure it out. [UPDATE: To be clear, I want to prevent it from writing a line of text to the screen. If I use Elmah, the text is not outputted to the screen, but is logged, and I'm wondering how to prevent that.] A: You should be able to configure log4net to only send logging messages to the EventLog. In your web.config you can add something like: Your logger will have to be configured so that it matches the pattern that is specified in the filter attribute. If you have multiple loggers defined and they both should be sending the event to the event log, you can have multiple appender elements, like so
