Emerging evidence suggests that components of the glycemic control process may influence the risk of advanced glycation end product (AGE)-related retinopathy in type 2 diabetes. To assess the relationship between three glycemic control markers and the cumulative incidence of severe AGE-related retinopathy in a large prospective cohort of type 2 diabetic adults followed for 4 years. A total of 1131 people with type 2 diabetes were enrolled in the Diabetes Control and Complications Trial/Epidemiology of Diabetes Interventions and Complications and followed up annually for 4 years for the development of severe AGE-related retinopathy and the occurrence of other microvascular complications. Glycosylated hemoglobin (HbA1c), glycated albumin, and plasma 1,6-hexanediol were measured at baseline. Fasting plasma glucose, plasma glucose at the time of a standard oral glucose tolerance test, and body mass index were also measured. The cumulative incidence of severe AGE-related retinopathy was 5.2% during 4 years of follow-up, and four parameters were independently associated with decreased risk of developing severe AGE-related retinopathy: fasting (P = 0.004), glycated albumin (P = 0.01), HbA1c (P = 0.04), and 1,6-hexanediol (P = 0.04). These associations remained significant after multivariable adjustment for multiple risk factors and for a composite risk score reflecting the number of risk factors (diabetes medications, fasting, glycated albumin, 1,6-hexanediol,
