Free Image Editing Software Some free image editing software is available online or through software stores. In fact, many image editing programs are distributed as free applications such as Adobe Photoshop Express. You may also find other types of free programs, such as Paint Shop Pro and Photoshop Sketch. However, you can search the Internet for free image editing software that you can download and use free of charge. Some programs such as Photoshop Express limit the number of editing tools and features you can use, but others such as Pixlr and Paint Shop Pro are more like advanced versions of the program you already have. ## Creating Stocks and Slides Unless you're an experienced photographer or have developed your own ability to create images that can be used on magazine covers and elsewhere in print, your camera is probably your best tool. When your images are done in Photoshop, your image-editing skills may be applied to them or you may simply use the stock images that Adobe offers. The Photoshop Elements program includes both stock and slide creators, and a lot of additional features such as slicing and splitting images into layers, and adjusting the saturation and toning in an image. There are even some new ways to work with layers, like applying different effects or applying a texture to your image.

What's New in the?

Image caption Mr Hawking first used his mouth to talk in November 2005 The BBC News website will be switching off its voice-activated search service as part of ongoing changes at BBC Online. The new technology will mean that pages such as the homepage will no longer speak out loud, offering the chance to read about the news. The news service will be restored by 20:00 GMT on 22 March. The BBC previously told the BBC audience that the service "isn't ready and has been retired in several countries" and it has been "patchy". The BBC research centre SpeechLab is said to have been developing the technology behind the service and some of the technical problems were brought to the public's attention by digital artist Aurélie Moliniére, an associate fellow of the BBC Commissioning Awards Unit. "The machine recorded your voice once, but never replayed the voice you said because it was doing something else," the artist tweeted. "If this is not a bug, I do not want to know." On its homepage, the BBC News website used to read: "Live BBC News now available via the latest speech technology. You can start a BBC News broadcast using spoken text, and read the news just as you watch it in real-time on TV and radio. Typed text will still be available as an alternative, but speech is now the preferred method." Image caption The BBC Research Centre SpeechLab, in Bristol, developed the voice technology Speech technology developed by the BBC Research Centre SpeechLab in Bristol. The BBC audio team already uses a slightly modified version, as part of the BBC News radio phone-in. The technology has been developed to enable programmes such as BBC Two's Newsnight, Radio 4's Today and Radio 5 Live to use speech on a show-to-show basis. A BBC spokeswoman said that the voice-activated search function was being retired as the search system in BBC.co.uk was being upgraded. Using the text or speech search instead of the technology will also prevent false results from appearing in news stories. "The technology doesn't guarantee that you will get the right result from a search, because the speech recognition service is based on a commercial service," the spokeswoman added. "In other words, the speech recognition service does not know the context of your search." BBC editors are now being asked to use the speech-based search as much as possible to ensure that
