The move is a blow to France, and Europe in general, which believes it was left out of the loop. America's number one military is the most powerful institution in world, and the White House is wary of criticising its allies in the days following a terrorist attack on their soil. GETTY • AP US president Barack Obama was allegedly briefed by French authorities on Friday US President Barack Obama met French President Emanuel Macron for the first time in Paris on January 21, 2017. They have been clashing over the US President's determination to scrap the Paris climate accord and withdraw from the Iran nuclear deal. Within the last few weeks, US media has poured light on the reasons for the relationship breaking down between the two nations. GETTY The White House said it will only talk to the French if they agree with its way of thinking GETTY He thought French intelligence was 'better than ours' The New York Times reported that the White House is accusing France of being too aligned with Putin's Russia, and that the new President Emmanuel Macron of being weak and indecisive. President Obama is said to have left Washington late on Thursday night, with Paris the following morning. The UK chose to enter into a pact with the EU last year, but still worked closely with other nations for important matters. Home Secretary Amber Rudd told LBC radio that France had to go into special measures to fight the terrorist threat. She said: "We are very united in the fight against Daesh, we want to be very united and co-operating. "We have a good working relationship with France and we are looking to improve that." GETTY Macron was welcomed at 10 Downing Street by
