X-ray imaging has been widely used for medical applications. A radiographic image is created by exposing the patient to penetrating radiation, and detecting the radiation transmitted through the patient using an imaging device. The imaging device converts the radiation to optical signals that can be processed to form an image. The radiation may be monoenergetic, polyenergetic, pulsed, continuously emitted, or scanned. For example, high-pitch (high-energy) radiation sources may be used in radiography of small structures in the body (e.g., micro-CT, micro-CT angiography (CTA), small animal micro-CT, or hybrid imaging applications), and may allow CT-like spatial resolution with much smaller detector systems, but at reduced X-ray energy (e.g., 8 keV at 70 mA). The X-ray energy or dose required in an imaging system may be estimated using the equation:

$$\text{dose} = \text{convolution of kerma} [J] = \text{flux} [\mu\text{Gy/pulse} \times \text{ms}] = \text{flux/aperture} [\mu\text{Gy/pulse/cm}^2] \times \text{thickness} [\text{cm}] = \text{conversion of Dose} [\text{cGy/mAs}] / \text{mA}$$

a common password to unlock my iPhone after a complete iOS backup. I am using it in combination with a 4 digit pin code, so I can be sure that I will unlock it even if somebody "borrows" my iPhone. My question is, if somebody obtains my common password, is it possible for that individual to unlock my iPhone? And can the same be said for a 4 digit pin code? A: If somebody obtains your common password, they can use that common password to unlock the phone and get full access to all of your data. (With the PIN, however, they'd have to guess the PIN in order to unlock.) I have known people to have their mother's first and lastname, and other common things, so their data would remain private even if they were stolen or lost. If you, however, change the PIN and use a new, random one, then even if somebody has your common password, they can't get access to your data without knowing the PIN. To combat brute force attacks, you can also disable the autofill feature. It's off by default, but you can go to Settings > iCloud > Password and turn on "Add AutoFill Suggestions".

1. Field of the Invention This invention relates to the field of electronic device manufacturing, and more particularly to reducing the number of dislocation defects occurring in semiconductor crystal wafers by using specially modified etching and cleaning procedures to eliminate anisotropic etching damage.

2. Description of the Related Art Electronic devices are typically manufactured by forming single crystal semiconductor wafers from a single source material, such as silicon, and then applying a layer of material, such as a metal, using various well-known techniques such as deposition and electro-deposition. After the metal layer is deposited, the material is subject to a chemical-mechanical polishing (CMP) operation in order to ensure that the desired metal features have a planar surface. The metal layer may be subjected to CMP for a single metal feature, or for multiple metal features, either simultaneously or in sequence. Typical CMP machines include horizontal machines, in which the wafer carrier is transported with roll
