Marital practices and lung cancer among women in five European countries: The EPIC-Heidelberg study. Alcohol, tobacco, and obesity are three environmental and lifestyle factors that have been linked to lung cancer, but it is unclear whether their associations with lung cancer differ by sexual partners and whether behavioral differences in intimate relationships might explain gender disparities in risk. In the present study, we examined these questions in a prospective cohort study of 182,851 women from five European countries (Denmark, France, Germany, the Netherlands, and Sweden). Life course patterns of tobacco, alcohol, and body mass index (BMI) were investigated with respect to marital practices and lung cancer risk, using Cox proportional hazards regression. After adjusting for potential confounders, lifetime abstainers from alcohol who did not want to have children (referent: ≥ 1 partner) had a significantly increased risk of lung cancer (RR = 1.35, 95% CI: 1.10-1.65) compared with those in a stable partnership with ≥ 1 partner. Compared with lifetime abstainers from alcohol and those who wanted to have children, increasing lifetime abstainers from alcohol had significantly increased risk of lung cancer. For smoking cessation, the risk of lung cancer was significantly increased among lifetime abstainers who did not want to have children in all three countries, but not in Denmark and Sweden. For obesity, there was no increase in risk for any marital status. We found no evidence that the association between life course patterns of alcohol and lung cancer differed by sexual partners. Our results suggest a biological explanation for the excess lung cancer among women in stable partnerships and among women who have quit or failed to quit alcohol use.
