“From creating an on-ice game that feels realistic and responsive right down to the playmaker animation, this new technology is a major focus for FIFA,” said Sean Bulle, Executive Producer on FIFA. “By taking advantage of the insights we’ve gained from real football players, FIFA 22 provides the most authentic, high-intensity gameplay experience to date.” EA SPORTS Motion Lab employs a 12-month process, which starts with a month of data collection and streaming into VR, the addition of new motion capture technology into the game. Then the team transfers all this data into the game, months later. The motion-capture captures the movement of 22 players from within a 4.5x4.5-meter space. From there, the data is sent to the EA Sports Motion Lab in Newcastle, U.K. where the team, comprised of more than 75 people, is the only dedicated motion capture team in the world. All of the data is added to a 4K high-resolution, 700 GB-scale motion capture archive. Once the process is complete, the data is sent to the lead animator at EA Play, with the help of the Lead Producer. The team then starts to create animations for next year's games, once again using the player motion data collected in the motion capture suits. The team goes through four phases with the data collection and recording. Throughout the process, the teams makes slight tweaks to each animations and players to see if they look and feel right. If the animation is working, it's the data collection and moving into the final phase, which the team calls the "Death Spiral." Virtual Reality (VR) sessions with the motion capture suits are streamed to the Motion Lab team. However, the technology wasn't suitable for all players in the full suits. For example, when players are tested in the suits, they can only move within a few meters. To account for this, the team has created new motion capture suits and created player models for FIFA 21. The Motion Lab team is also continually improving the technology to ensure that it accurately tracks the movement of the players. A featured analysis for FIFA 22 includes the on-the-ball actions of players on the left, right and central pitch to see what type of play they make. From there, the data is used to help create animations of player movement and the physics for the ball. Players were captured in action,

A soccer game, sort of. There are hundreds of international teams, thousands of players, and hundreds of thousands of customisable kits. There's also a full-fledged career mode, and a minigame that lets you play pick-up-with-friends matches. Today, there are more people playing FIFA than ever. But this soccer game—that is, the video game version of soccer—isn't like FIFA 14 was. It doesn't have the novelty of the Career Mode, and it doesn't have a "star studded roster," or a system that lets you play as a manager. It's still a soccer game, though, and it's still a good one, thanks in large part to one of the most rewarding gameplay structures around. It's the "what if?" of football: on the pitch, you're just a nameless player trying to be the best, rather than a manager whose impact is felt by thousands of people. The game's artificial intelligence doesn't care what you do, and the ball doesn't follow you around, it just does its best to maintain possession. You're on the pitch, tasked with out-attacking, out-kicking, and out-marking your opponents, the whole time trying to resist the urge to tackle. In the end, it's all about positioning, timing, and execution. And when you get it right, there's a sense of satisfaction and a feeling of achievement that no FIFA game has ever been able to replicate. The beauty of FUT's system is the way it's designed to keep you from getting frustrated and detached, even if you're playing at a high level. Picking your team is all about winning games and being in the right place at the right time. You might be away from your team-mates, and without any say in the actual events of a game, but you still have a significant impact. You can't match them on creativity, but you can slow them down, get their out players trapped, or catch the onrushing ball in the air. If you're the player you're doing everything for a game you're losing. The frustration of FUT is being outsmarted, not being outmanoeuvred. It's about the struggle to string together three passes for a cross and win the penalty shootout. It's the feeling of relief that you eventually realise you've done it, and you somehow helped your team win the game, even though you won't get the
