.... No code really needed, I just need any help :D... it always shows up in my dashboard, even though I've tried to delete it. 170988 (10/15/2009) been born of a man... David, of blessed memory, was one of the most sterling characters that ever existed in this very town. Nothing could take the heart out of him -- he set his heart on doing a good act.' I have a very nice friend who is also a closet packrat like me, but she will only donate her clothes if they are COMPLETELY worn out, I would be able to donate them to any thrift store, as long as they were completely worn out, including the tags. It is quite an operation. I would have to scrub down the clothes, add or remove whatever I want to keep, wash and dry them, make sure they are sorted, add any extras like buttons and iron them, etc. But, I have a large closet and I have been doing this for years, I just do not want to go through the whole operation of going to the thrift store and "handing over" my old clothes, as if it was a different person who had given them away. So, if your donation is for a non profit, I would still have to have all the tags removed, by a professional. I think I would appreciate it much more, because I know you would not be donating an entire room full of your belongings to charity, and you would not be donating your old clothes that were still in good condition, to any thrift store. Hope this helps.Carnitine enhances proliferation of myoblasts from dysferlin deficient Becker muscular dystrophy patients. Every two userIds have a common productId. For some users, I have a lot of productIds (some are specific to that user), and for some other users, only a handful of productIds. How do I perform a group by function that will take into account this fact? Right now I am doing something like this, but it is not grouping by userId: def count_product_by_user_id(df, key): count = df[key].value_counts(sort=False) return count df['totalCount'] = df.groupby(['UserId'])[['ProductId']].transform(count_product_by_user_id) Some sample data: ProductId | UserId 1 | 0 1 | 1 1 | 2 2 | 1 2 | 2 3 | 0 3 | 1 3 | 2 3 | 3 Is it possible to have something like the following? This does not work. ProductId | UserId 1 | 1
