Variation of somatic embryogenesis in Persicaria laxa: assessment of plantlet production and variability of auxin level in auxin-treated protoplasts. A protocol for somatic embryogenesis of the submerged culture of Persicaria laxa was developed. Induction of embryogenesis was achieved by 20 μM naphthaleneacetic acid plus 0.1 μM kinetin. Embryogenic clusters were initiated in foliar regions of the leafy shoot apical meristem. Plantlets, consisting of four cotyledons with true leaves, were regenerated on solid culture medium supplemented with 20 μM 2,4-dichlorophenoxyacetic acid. The level of indole acetic acid in auxin-treated protoplasts was estimated by HPLC. It varied from 2.5 μM in protoplasts to 3.8 μM in fully developed embryos and plantlets. Although slight differences in the auxin concentration of protoplasts were detected, differences in the auxin-treated protoplast populations were not. A developmental variability of auxin levels in the protoplasts was found.Q: How does one calculate energy levels of the nucleus of an atom? How do you calculate the energy levels of an atom's nucleus? I know these levels have to do with the electrons of the nucleus and the electrons are hard to calculate. And that's why we use the Potential Energy to figure out levels. Is this true? Or are there other ways of calculating levels of the nucleus? A: The energy levels of the nucleus depends on the distance from the nucleus and other reasons as well. If the nucleus is very close to another charged nucleus then the electric potential will be different. A: In the last chapter of the book I.I.Rabi: A Scientist Remembers, Rabi describes how he was asked to explain to a general audience how magnetic fields could cause a change in the rotational momentum of an electron, thus giving an explanation of the gyromagnetic ratio of electrons. In the course of describing this, he also describes how he had been given a diagram, presumably by his advisor Hans Zitterbewerber, which clearly showed that the energy of the rotational states of the electron-proton system could be compared with that of a hydrogen atom in an electric field. So he was aware that the hydrogen atom was a spect

In another cell when I click a button, it opens another view controller which should get all the values from the first cell. I've tried using [[UITableViewCell alloc] init]; and [self.tableView reloadData] but it doesn't seem to be working.
