What's New In Photoshop Light Effect Brushes Free Download?

In the early 2000s, when the economic boom was in full swing in Shanghai, Shen Xiaolian was a senior manager at a chemical company. She remembers vividly when she attended an international seminar for middle-level company bosses organised by the Shanghai government. She was the only female in the room, and her boss had put her in charge of a small meeting afterwards. When the attendees began chatting at the buffet, he warned her not to disturb them. But, ever since his boss had retired, he began chatting away loudly with other men, describing his sexual exploits with Shen's boss. Shen remembers the episode clearly. "I was embarrassed and depressed," she says, "but there was nothing I could do. I was just a secretary – it was not worth my while to complain." Now she is a "business woman" in the city, helping run several successful companies. She has been involved with the Shanghai Women's Federation (SWF) for the last four years, which has been designed as a channel for the city's female business owners and managers. The SWF has more than 1,000 members, Shen says, and aims to create a sharing economy that will raise the female representation in Shanghai's business sector. "We want women to develop their professional abilities and have more opportunities," she says. "We want a merger between women and men. This is about finding a balance between genders. If we take better care of our female employees, we will get better results for the companies. China is a patriarchal society, but gender equality is definitely improving." Shen, who is also the director of a society called the Entrepreneurial Ladies Club, says that female participation in the Chinese business sector has increased steadily over the last few years. Some of her fellow female business owners she has spoken to say that, while their companies have difficulties finding or keeping women to fill non-management roles – such as managers and salespeople – there are more opportunities for female entrepreneurs. She adds that the SWF has organised a number of women's businesses days and seminars for female managers as a way of boosting their numbers. The information she and other women she speaks to has – if a little tentatively – given her the impression that there are more women – and fewer men – in the world of business in Shanghai. And that women are gradually fighting back. "I met a group of female leaders at the SWF," she says. "They are very open about what they think about the imbalance of
