1. We propose to develop and apply a unique molecular recognition technology in which synthetic molecules whose properties are defined by their structures, including but not limited to organic receptors, are attached to electrode surfaces. This approach can be used to create a very stable array of molecular recognition sites. Individual molecules within the array are identified by their characteristic electrochemical response, however, there will be no "electroactive" analogs for each individual molecular recognition site. This enables the development of fast and high-fidelity molecular recognition devices in which molecular recognition is based upon individual molecules in a unique and self-contained array. We focus on the electrochemical detection of carbohydrates, which are major components of pathogens, toxins, and hormones. We believe that this technology will offer a very significant opportunity for the development of fast and cost effective biosensors to identify these important biological agents. A major shortcoming of current biosensors, which is shared by other nanotechnology platforms such as protein microarrays, is that they require a molecular recognition element on a biological agent or label. The major problem with this approach is that these biological agents are potent biological toxins and would be dangerous if released into the environment. In order to circumvent this problem, our biosensor technology exploits the host-guest interaction between saccharides (e.g., carbohydrates, glycans, and oligosaccharides) and cyclodextrins (CDs), which is the basis for the impressive stability, specificity, and selectivity of biological enzymes such as antibodies and ligands. Thus, by attaching a cyclodextrin molecule to the unique molecular recognition site on the electrode surface, we will be able to monitor the interaction between this new kind of "non-biological sensor" and a biological agent, with no need for biological labels. We have already synthesized a number of monomeric and dimeric CD-containing molecules, which can be modified with specific recognition structures. We have already shown the efficacy of this
