Hemodynamic and metabolic data in physically active and healthy elderly people. In epidemiological surveys, many more unfit elderly than fit elderly people have been found. However, in the literature, relatively few studies have evaluated the differences between elderly people with or without physical activity, even though these are the most appropriate ones to compare, since they define separate cohorts. Such comparison is important for two reasons: first, to reveal any additional unfitness in physically inactive elderly people; second, to reveal the differences between fit elderly people with and without physical activity. From the perspective of the well-being of older people, this study is of interest since the level of activity is a strong indicator of the quality of life of the individual. The purpose of this study was to compare the functional capacity of physically active and inactive elderly subjects. Functional capacity was measured by means of the Maximum Oxygen Consumption (VO_{2max}) of the subjects and an objective assessment of their physical activity during a maximal exercise test. The results showed significant differences in VO_{2max} between the groups of elderly people (vigorous physical activity was associated with a significant increase of 15% compared to sedentary subjects), but not in the post-exercise parameters of lactate, total energy expenditure or heart rate. The comparison of the metabolic results revealed no significant differences between the groups. On the basis of the evidence presented, we conclude that physically active elderly subjects can usually perform

Gender, externalizing symptoms, and the mediation of social support. The authors conducted a mediation analysis to test a model of how peer relationship quality (PQ) with parents moderates the influence of child externalizing symptoms on satisfaction with family life. The main effects of externalizing symptoms and PQ on satisfaction were equivalent. However, the PQ-by-externalizing symptoms interaction affected satisfaction in a different way for boys and girls, with lower levels of PQ helping boys to be less affected by externalizing symptoms and the highest levels of PQ helping girls to have the fewest negative consequences of externalizing symptoms. Despite that boys and girls in the sample showed very similar symptom patterns, the gender differences in the moderation of PQ by externalizing symptoms may inform more specific intervention efforts that involve fathers.
