But what makes this book so distinctive and exciting is its focus on PLM from a systemic point-of-view. Histological and microanatomical changes in the intestinal tract of juvenile and adult male and female rats receiving high levels of doxycycline. The aim of this work is to investigate the toxic effects of high levels of doxycycline on the intestinal tract, using histological and microanatomical studies. In this work, 35 adult Wistar rats were randomly divided into four groups of seven animals each. Animals from groups 1 and 2 were injected with 1 mL/kg of a doxycycline solution (25 mg/mL) in water for 30 days. Group 3 received the same volume of water without doxycycline. Animals from group 4 served as controls. After 30 days, necropsies of animals from groups 1 and 2 were performed and histological and microanatomical studies were carried out. Animals from group 3 survived the period of treatment and were euthanized after 30 days. Animals from group 4 were also euthanized after 30 days. In animals from group 1, major lesions were observed in the intestinal tract, including the stomach, duodenum, jejunum, ileum, cecum, and colon. Histological and microanatomical studies revealed vacuolization of the mucosa and superficial necrosis of the intestinal epithelium in animals from group 1, the existence of edema in the mesenchyme of the lamina propria and submucosa, and perforation of small intestinal mucosa in one animal from this group. In animals from group 2, vacuolization of the epithelium and necrosis of the submucosal layer of the intestinal tract were observed. Perforation of the jejunum, ileum, and colon was also observed. Animals from group 3 were euthanized after 30 days. Microanatomical studies showed deep tissue edema and inflammatory infiltrate in the lamina propria of the jejunum and ile
