Finally, the AABC, GES and GHS criteria were compared with the GEMS screening questionnaire recommended for general use among Danish children ([ref22]), and the sensitivities and specificities were determined. The differences among the screening tools were not substantial, with the exception of the GEMS questionnaire. However, the GEMS questionnaire contained a question pertaining to antibiotic use, and the sensitivity and specificity were 83% and 82%, respectively. Notably, the GEMS questionnaire has been validated for use among Danish children ([ref28]; [ref13]; [ref35]), as well as among adult patients with chronic kidney disease ([ref4]). 5.

CONCLUSIONS ===== The present study examined the frequencies of bacterial colonization among hospitalized children and identified the most common colonizing bacteria and the most common risk factors for colonization. The most common bacterial colonization detected in our cohort was S. aureus, C. albicans, C. acnes, E. coli and S. salivarius. Frequencies of MRSA colonization were relatively low. Common risk factors for colonization included eating, using indwelling medical devices and antibiotic use. Colistin was the most frequently prescribed antibiotic. The authors thank Mariana Maghazaei, MD, Ph.D., statistician and biostatistician from National Iranian Oil Company, for statistical analysis of the data. Author's contribution ===== All authors participated in the study design, and JT, PN, AZ and PN were responsible for the collection of data. PN drafted the manuscript. Pancreaticopleural fistula occurs when pancreatic secretions leak into the pleural space. Our purpose was to evaluate the outcome of exocrine drainage in pancreaticopleural fistula and to determine factors that may influence management. We performed a retrospective analysis of all patients diagnosed with pancreaticopleural fistula during a 12-year period from 1984 to 1996. Forty-one patients met the criteria for pancreaticopleural fistula, including 29 patients with stricture/obstruction of the distal common bile duct (CBD) and 12 patients with a dilated transduodenal papilla. Medical records, radiographic findings, operative notes, and pathology reports were reviewed. Patients were classified as "drainable" if there was no dilatation of the pancreatic duct distal to the stricture/obstruction. If exocrine drainage was performed, patients were classified as "drainable" if there was no reflux of pancreatic fluid on the third postoperative day. Patients were divided into two groups: the "drainable" group of patients who underwent successful drainage and the "non-drainable" group of patients in whom drainage was unsuccessful. Of the 41 patients with pancreaticopleural fistula, 25 (61.0%) were classified as "drainable" and 16 (39.0%) were classified as "non-drainable." Median duration of drainage was 6 days in the "drainable" group and 13 days in the "non-drainable" group (p
